

ROBISCHON

Emotionally referring to how everything turned out, she had emotional self-acceptance and commitment to an estranged son, refusing to feed them or provide shelter as they would continue with their independence on their own terms. She always imagined that time was about to run out, that history was over before she finished, and that regrets are quite simply the scars that mark away the dreams that have long since been forgotten.